CHAPTER V.—CONTINUED.

"My good woman, what is the matter?" Paul asks, taking a step and coming to her side.

She starts back with a little scream, but being reassured by the intruder's voice, stands in silence.

"What is it, good woman, that grieves you; what has gone amiss?"

"Oh sir it is enough to break my heart, my husband has married again. He now has his seventh wife."

Here was a glorious opportunity for the accomplishment of his purpose. This woman was one of Elder Drew's wives, and she might be able to give him some very valuable information concerning the whereabouts of Ola.

"Do not weep, good woman," he said, in a cautious undertone, fearing he would be overheard, "but answer some of my questions, and I may be of service to you. That seventh wife, the girl whom he married this morning does not want to be his wife."

"Are you sure?"

"I am."

"You must be mistaken," said the woman. "She has been so deceitful;—while she pretended not to love him—even to despise him, she really did love him. Oh I know it—I was his favorite until he met her, but now I am cast off like all the others."

"This cannot be true?" groaned Paul, staggering back as if he had received a blow.

"It is true, stranger, oh I know, it is true. Ask her uncle, Mr. Marshall Hyde, and you will learn that it is true."

"No, no, I will ask herself and from her own lips know the truth of these assertions; where is she?"

"Gone off with her husband on a bridal tour to the mountains."

"Then God pity her," gasped Paul, and he caught at a small shrub to sustain himself from falling.

CHAPTER VI.

ON CHURCH ISLAND.

Ola Hyde had remained alone in the arbor where her lover left her, patiently waiting his return. She had some vague fears that all was not right, yet continued hoping for the best.

"He stays an unreasonable length of time," the impatient girl was at last compelled to admit to herself.

At this moment she heard cautious footsteps approaching.

"He comes," she thought and at once began making arrangements for a hasty departure. It was yet too dark to recognize features and before she dreamed of an enemy near she was seized by a Danite who, covering her mouth with his hand, smothered the scream she would have uttered.

Wild with terror and almost fainting, the brave girl made a gallant struggle for liberty. She was hurried to a carriage, and with a captor on either side, driven to the tabernacle.

Here, to her horror, she beheld Elder Drew and a Mormon priest.

"This is the lady whom I am to wed this morning," said the elder, addressing the priest who had on his official robes.

With eyes blazing with defiance and cheeks pale as the angel of death, the proud girl drew her form up to its full height, and in a manner most tragic, cried:

"It is false. I have been abducted, and was brought here against my wishes."

"Heed her not, and obey my injunctions," thundered Elder Drew, his saffron colored skin turning to a sickly white. He hastened to the side of the beautiful girl and made an effort to take her hand. "Never!" she cried, starting back.

Heavens! what a picture of loveliness. That Grecian face, divinely beautiful on all occasions, seemed only the more charming by her heroic resolve. Her proud eyes flashed, her bosom rose and fell as she stood boldly before the shrinking priest, a perfect queen in her glorious loveliness.

The sight seemed to madden Elder Drew, and more fully confirmed his resolve to make her his wife.

"Come, come, my dear girl, you will soon be Mrs. Drew number seven, but you shall have no reason to complain, for all my love shall be bestowed upon you." He seized her hand as he spoke, and by the aid of his hired minions dragged the struggling girl towards the altar, where the priest stood ready to officiate.

"Unhand me you wretch! Elder Drew, if you consummate this outrage I will be the death of you," cried the despairing girl. "Oh, Father in heaven, aid me! Help! help!"

"You can scream until you are hoarse, my charmer, but it will avail you nothing; you will not be heard beyond these walls," said Elder Drew, in a tantalizing manner.

It was a pitiful sight to see her struggle and implore mercy, but hearts hard as steel surrounded her, and all ears were deaf to her cries.

She was confused, bewildered, but she knew that the ceremony was going on despite her efforts to prevent it—knew that it was ended and she was pronounced the wife of this loathsome man.

As she was being dragged, half insensible, from the tabernacle, she heard a familiar, well-beloved voice. Oh, how manly it sounded in its bold defiance. Then on her confused senses came sounds of conflict. She was placed in the carriage and became insensible.

When Elder Drew became certain that Paul Markham could not pursue them, he quickly regained his composure. Gazing down upon the fair, sweet face of the girl he held in his arms, his eyes gleamed with a depth of passion that was terrible. Never did he gaze on a more lovely creature. Her hair, like curled shreds of gold lay in tangled masses about a face and shoulders white as purest snow.

"Ha, ha, ha, ha!" chuckled the villain, his saffron colored face glowing with a strange bewildering pleasure. "At last she is mine, wholly mine, and no earthly power can snatch her from me. Oh, how I love her," he panted, his hideous face above the unconscious girl and his eyes glaring at her. "I love her as men love who love but once—as that young fool back there in the power of the Danites never could care for her if he lived a million years. The scheme for obtaining her for her wealth she is to inherit in Ohio is all forgotten, pride and craft no longer holds sway in my soul. My other six wives shall be cast aside for this angel. It is she—this soft dazzling, haughty girl—woman—whom I love and to whom I will give my undivided love if I could but secure from her one tithe of the passion with which I adore her. But though that may never be, she shall yet be mine."

The elder was driven at once to his house and Ola, who had partially recovered, was lifted from the carriage and taken into a room, where she was locked in alone, and from which there was no escape. The story of the Elder's late marriage soon spread all over the house.

Elder Drew ordered breakfast for himself and his new wife to be served in her apartment, and retired to his own room to give exclusive attention to his personal adornment, when there came a violent ring at the door bell.

Furious at this disturbance, the Mormon ordered a servant to go and see who it was.

In a few moments the servant returned with Bill Hickman, chief of the Danites, at his heels.

"What in the name of the brimstone region brings you here," the elder demanded.

"He has escaped!" gasped Bill. "Who?"

"The Gentle."

His swarthy cheek growing livid with rage, the elder, with a yell of fury, leaped at the Danite's throat. But Hickman was a powerful man and seizing the Mormon elder planted him in a seat where for a moment he sat breathless, glaring at the Danite chief. At last regaining his voice he hissed:

"Fool, why did you let him escape? why didn't you kill him?"

Bill Hickman then proceeded to give a graphic account of how the youthful Gentle had escaped, or rather been rescued by the Yankee.

"What am I to do?" cried the elder, starting to his feet and pacing the apartment, his brows gathered into knotted cords. "It will be all over the city in an hour, and I may be called upon to give up the girl. By heaven, I will never do that. They may force me to yield up my life, but that sweet angel never."

For several moments he continued to pace the apartment, his head bowed in thought, his mind evolving some plan calculated to further his own dark designs. At last he said:

"Bill, I want you to send me two of your most trusty and bravest men."

"I will. How soon do you want them?"

"Right away. We have not a moment to lose. I am going to send the girl to Church Island on the lake. They will not find her there."

"And you want two men for a guard?"

"Correct, there is an old Mormon and his wife living there, both deaf as posts, and with them she will be secure."

"Can you trust them?"

"Oh, yes, they would not dare go back on me."

"And in the meanwhile, what will you do?"

"I will go with them to the island, and then keep out of the way until this has had time to blow over. Have the carriage ready to take us to the south side, where I have a small yacht, have the two men meet me at the landing on the lake. I must now go to old Marshal Hyde and make him believe that Orson Pratt has had another vision."

The scheming Mormon and his hired ally each went about his business, and in thirty minutes all arrangements had been made.

Oh his return Elder Drew was met by his youngest wife, Jennie, a pale pretty woman, who, raising her tear stained face to his, said:

"Is it true, oh, is it true, that you have brought another here?"

"Stand aside, woman, go away you fool, I have no time to talk with you."

"Where are you going?" the weeping, heart-broken woman asked, as she saw him making preparations to leave.

"Going on my wedding tour."

He had some food sent to Ola who refused it. Then he had her taken to a carriage.

"She does on me, Jennie, you ought to see how she loves me," said Elder Drew to the weeping woman, whom he left sobbing in her room, and frantic with jealousy.

In a few moments Elder Drew was in the carriage with the shrinking beauty, whose great tear-stained eyes had no compassion upon him. The carriage whirled away in the direction of the mountains, but when out of sight of the city changed its course for the lake.

"Oh, where are you going to take me? Will you not let me go?" the fair girl asked, her face white as alabaster.

"God forbid, my angel; we are on our wedding tour. You are my wife."

"It is false," she cried, fiercely, her eyes gleaming with hatred and defiance.

"Aye, my dear, you have no idea how pretty you are when your sweet face is inflamed with rage and fire flashes from your beautiful eyes."

"Elder Drew," said Ola fiercely, the expression on her fair face becoming terrible. "If you touch me I will kill you, even though I have to do it while you sleep."

The swarthy face of the Mormon was again changed to white and involuntarily he shrank from the beautiful tigress. There was an earnestness in her eyes, which he could not question. His fears, however, were only momentary, quickly regaining his self-control he said in an undertone: "No, no, though she does look a very devil, I am not one to be intimidated."

For several moments longer however, she kept him partially under the strange spell her eyes produced.

"If you do not take me back to my uncle at once, I shall be the death of you."

There was such an earnest ring in her voice that the elder knew she meant what she said; but fully recovering himself he replied:

"I declare, my dear, you are perfectly charming. I will take you for a sail, we will remain until you come to like me better."

"Oh, heaven, are you going to keep up this madness?"

"It is not madness, my dear. I have a neat little cottage there, carefully kept by two faithful servants who will be very kind to you."

"With hands clasped and brain in a whirl, she sank back. Never had Elder Drew seemed so disgustingly hateful and ugly as now.

The carriage at last stopped and she found herself on the banks of the lake. The breeze blowing from over the salty waters failed to refresh her. There was a small yacht near by, in the mouth of a creek, and a grim silent looking man sat in the stern, his hand on the tiller.

Two more savage looking men, with pistols and knives in their belts stood on the bank of the creek waiting for them. Two horses that bore evidences of hard travel were tied to a tree.

Elder Drew gave some instructions to the coachman, and Ola was led between the two ruffianly looking rascals to the yacht. Half fainting and sick with terror, she sank into a seat and buried her face in her hands. In a few moments the yacht was in motion, and went skimming over the waves.

"We are on our voyage love," he said in a harsh, grating, sarcastic voice, while the smile on his face was perfectly hideous.

Oh, the look of withering scorn and hate she gave him! He seemed to shrink beneath that gaze, but at the same time her ravishing beauty seemed to embolden and madden him.

Having a fair breeze and the yacht being a swift sailer, the voyage was made quickly, but in almost utter silence. Ola did not speak once during the voyage. Church Island was reached at last, the yacht ran into the mouth of a creek and the seventh wife of the Mormon elder was conducted to a small, but pretty looking cottage, standing in the midst of a beautiful grove of trees. Elder Drew, for some reason which Ola could not understand, remained behind, while two savage looking Danites accompanied the girl who scarcely could ascend the hill to the cottage.

A hard featured woman of fifty and a hard featured man of about the same age met them at the door. At the sight of one of her sex Ola's hopes rose, and she determined to implore mercy of the old woman.

"Oh kind lady, do not let them harm me, I have been abducted and dragged here against my will."

But the woman looked so fierce that the unfortunate girl shrank back as if she feared she would strike her.

"Guess ye'd better let granny alone, or she'll heave som thing at yer," chuckled one of her guards. "She's deafen'n an adder, been so nigh onto eight years. I tell ye the elder's not goin' to let ye git away. He's not one to be fooled with, so the sooner ye give in an' quit kicking the better."

With a despairing shriek the unfortunate girl sank down upon a rude chair in one corner of the room, and covered her face with her hands. She realized the bitter truth of the Danite's assertion. She was wholly in the power of Elder Drew and at his mercy.
